Homes of the future

Paragraph A

Scientists predict that in the future over 80% of houses in the UK will be replaced with the Super Home. Why? Well, with the rising energy prices, if your house cannot generate its own electricity you are going to struggle to pay your energy bills. The environmentally friendly Super Home will be more expensive to buy but its own electricity generation system will make it the only affordable option for many.

Paragraph B

Its roof will be made of solar panels and these will be able to store energy from the sun in special batteries for up to six months. The batteries can also store wind energy, which will be generated from small windmills also located on the roof.

Paragraph C

In addition to these features, all houses will have a heat control system. This can be set from your mobile phone so if you know you are coming home late, you can switch the heating off and set it to come on just before you return.

Paragraph D

That is not all you will be able to do from your phone. You will also be able to see if your children are doing their homework by accessing one of the 20 or more cameras positioned around the house. If they are not, you can speak to them through the entertainment and communications system (ECS). I am not sure I like that idea, though!

Paragraph E

The ECS can also be switched off and on by placing your hand on a sensor. When it is dinner time and you want your children to stop using the computer or watching TV, just place your hand on the sensor and it will pause TVs and computers.

Paragraph F

They say that all of this will happen in the future, but some of this is already happening.

The father of movement

Paragraph one

The county of Cornwall is in the southwest of the British Isles. A man who lived there was responsible for one of the biggest changes in the whole of human history. Born in 1771, Richard Trevithick, a very tall man with red hair, invented the railway train. This invention is commonly credited to George Stevenson in the 1820s, but Trevithick's first train was running more than twenty years earlier.

Paragraph two

 A (Example) . After leaving school, Trevithick went to work for him, quickly showing that he had a talent for the job. At this time, steam engines were used a lot in Cornish industry, and Trevithick gave himself the task of making them more efficient and cheaper to use.

Paragraph three

 7. . In December of that year, he ran his first 'road train' in his home town. Sadly, he forgot to add enough water to make the amount of steam he needed, and the 'road train' broke down.

Paragraph four

 8. . By 1804 he had designed and built the world's first railway train. The first journey, on 4 February, carried ten tons of iron and 75 unexpected passengers who jumped on without an invitation. The train travelled at five miles per hour and the journey was nine miles long. This train faced a problem though – it was too heavy for the rails, which broke under it.

Paragraph five

Trevithick was a very stubborn character and refused to accept defeat. In 1808 he opened the world's first passenger railway in London. The train, called 'Catch Me Who Can' cost five pence to ride and travelled in a small circle throughout the summer.

Paragraph six

 9. . In Peru, he worked as an engineer, saving money to buy a silver mine. Just after he bought it, a war began. Unlucky Trevithick had to move back to Britain.

Paragraph seven

 10. . Unfortunately, he was never recognised or paid for any of his inventions. However, he continued to invent things we are familiar with today, for example central heating and propellers for steam boats. Although during his lifetime he did not achieve fame, he is now one of the most well-known British inventors in history.
